Chevrolet Silverado 1500 flexes off-road prowess

The 2027 edition of the pickup boasts new features, tech and smart design. In Money

Watch out for these teams that could sow CFP chaos

With three weeks to go, we scout five teams that might upend the playoff bracket. In Sports

USA TODAY

THE NATION'S NEWS | $3 | WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 2026

LEFT: MANOLI FIGETAKIS/GETTY IMAGES; MIKE COPPOLA/GETTY IMAGES

Actors bond over 'How to Rob a Bank,' fatherhood

Nicholas Hoult, left, and Pete Davidson discuss making the timely action comedy and which films they'll show their children one day. In Life

Inflation cools, but Fed hike is likely

Prices rise 0.4%, more than experts expected

Rachel Barber
USA TODAY

Consumer prices rose at a slower pace in October than in the previous month, but forecasters suspect the slight slowdown in inflation will likely not be enough to spare Americans from higher borrowing costs as the Federal Reserve weighs another interest rate hike in December.

U.S. consumer prices climbed 0.4% over the month of October, down from a 0.6% rise in September, the Labor Department said Nov. 10.

Because a federal government shutdown suspended the department's data collection in October 2025, it did not report the annual inflation rate or year-over-year price changes in the Nov. 10 report because it lacked that data for comparison.

The cost of groceries rose 0.4% in October, according to Labor Department data released Nov. 10. That's down from 0.6% in September.
JOE RAEDLE/GETTY IMAGES

The 0.4% rise in prices over the month is higher than forecasters expected. Before the report's release, the Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland's "Nowcast" projected prices increased by 0.24% in October.

Core inflation – the department's way to measure price changes while excluding volatile energy and food costs – also exceeded expectations, rising 0.3% in October, the department said. Before the report's release, the Cleveland Fed's "Nowcast" projected a 0.21% rise in core inflation. The 0.3% rise could prompt Fed officials to vote for a larger rate hike in their final meeting of the year.

"This is the last look at CPI inflation the Fed will get before its December meeting, and it most likely seals the deal on a rate hike to close the year," James McCann, senior economist of investment strategy at Edward Jones, said in a note, adding the question is whether officials will approve a quarter- or half-point hike. "On balance we think it is most likely that the Fed will deliver a 25 basis points move, especially with oil prices moving lower in recent days and financial conditions increasingly volatile."

Behind the increase in core inflation were price hikes on recreation commodities, medical care and public transportation. As Americans booked their holiday travel, airline fares also ticked up in October, rising 0.4%.

See INFLATION, Page 2A

0 89505 03005 7 46

PLEASE RECYCLE

©COPYRIGHT 2026
USA TODAY,
A division of
USA TODAY Co., Inc.

HOME DELIVERY
1-800-872-0001, USATODAYSERVICE.COM

Officials say rural Oklahoma is littered with possibly thousands of abandoned marijuana grows, often with chemicals and other hazardous materials left behind. PHOTOS BY NATHAN J. FISH/USA TODAY NETWORK

TOXIC LEGACY

Abandoned pot grows leave pesticides and chemicals that threaten the environment

Ben Fenwick Special to The Oklahoman | USA TODAY NETWORK

HOLDENVILLE, OK

When Oklahoma lawmakers finally gave Sheriff Jim Mullett the go-ahead, he began reining in marijuana businesses in Garvin County and shutting down the illegal ones. ● Mullett said there were 470 grows in the approximately 800-square-mile county in 2021. Together with the Oklahoma Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs Control, the state Attorney General's Office and other local, state and federal agencies, Mullett said he and his deputies brought the number of grow sites down to 33. ● But soon he uncovered another problem in his central Oklahoma county: What happens to all the stuff left behind – including the land, chemicals and agricultural equipment?

A drained lake bed sits on the property of an abandoned marijuana grow in rural Holdenville, Oklahoma.

"What's going on in, around the state of Oklahoma, is that you got these abandoned grows that are just left there to rot, and now you got trash, and it's all grown up," he said. "It's land that's not being used."

In 2018, Oklahomans voted into law a medical marijuana industry that had few regulations and possibly fewer safeguards. At the high-water mark in 2021, Oklahoma had more than 9,000 licensed marijuana grow facilities.

When hundreds of licenses were shown to be fraudulent, rife with straw buyers fronting for out-of-state owners, many operators walked away. Officials believe as many as 6,000 were shut down, sold off or abandoned.

See GROW SITES, Page 6A

Idaho mom accused of killing toddler twins

Andrea Shaw is pictured with Tyson and Dallas."She absolutely loved and adored the twins," her attorney says.
PROVIDED BY JOE FILICETTI

Children were vaccinated shortly before deaths

Amanda Lee Myers
USA TODAY

If Idaho mother Andrea Shaw goes to trial for the deaths of her twin toddlers, jurors will have to decide which is true: whether the 18-month-olds died of a mysterious illness possibly caused by vaccinations or whether their mother killed them.

Prosecutors, who plan to seek the death penalty for Shaw, say that suffocation "is the only conceivable explanation" for the deaths of her son Tyson and his twin sister Dallas in May 2025 in Payette, a small city in western Idaho near the Oregon border. Police arrested Shaw on murder charges in June, more than a year after their deaths.

Shaw's defense attorney says that she would never have hurt the children, that a county coroner found that the deaths were "undetermined" and that prosecutors have no evidence proving murder. He says Tyson and Dallas, who were born three months premature, became sick after receiving flu shots and childhood vaccinations.

"All she's ever wanted to be is a mom and to be the best mom she could be," Shaw's attorney, Joe Filicetti, told USA TODAY. "She absolutely loved and

See IDAHO MOM, Page 4A